The policing of rural areas and communities often requires a different approach or adaptation of current practice by local forces. The nature of rural areas compared to urban locations such as differing geography, varied and unique criminal activity, and demands of local community residents, means that the police are required to use new resources, different technologies, and specialist approaches to tackle the issues presented.